MARK TWAIN visited Palestine in 1871 and he documented the desolation and unpeopled nature of Palestine as "a hopeless, dreary, heart-broken land." On the approach to Jerusalem, "There was hardly a tree or shrub anywhere. Even the olive tree and the cactus, those fast friends of a worthless soil, had almost deserted the country."

Fredrik Hasselquist, a Swedish doctor and naturalist, visited the (today's Israel, Gaza, West Bank. He wrote that the Holy Land is "uncultivated and almost uninhabited." The primary source of income to the Turkish administration are the fees charged to visitors;

4,000 European, Greek and Armenian visitors yearly, along with an equal number of Jews from "all quarters of the world."

He estimates the Jewish population of Jerusalem to be 20,000, surely a substantial proportion of its population, while the town of Tiberius is described as half inhabited by Arabs, and the other half by Jews, who pay taxes to the Arabs.

Felix Bovet, a Christian theologian and professor of French Literature and Hebrew, visited the Holy Land in 1858 and wrote a book describing it. Bovet's describes a dreary desolate landscape that is sparsely inhabited. He notes that close to half of the population of Jerusalem is Jews, and that a majority of the Jews in Jerusalem are indigenous, that is, Turkish subjects. He concludes the Palestine section of the book stating that the Turks "have made a desert of it where it is scarcely possible to walk without fear. Even the Arabs who dwell there do so as temporary sojourners."

The late American economist Fred M. Gottheil published an article titled "The Population of Palestine, circa 1875" in 1979 in the journal Middle Eastern Studies. In it Gottheil refers to the writings and reports of 13 additional mid-19th century observers, including James Finn, the British consul for Palestine. All of them, he writes, report that Palestine is a desolate and underpopulated place.

The continuity of Jewish life in the Holy Land is well documented. The Jewish presence in Palestine did not plummet to zero after the Jewish defeat by the Romans in 70 CE.

Archaeological evidence shows that with the fall of Jerusalem, the center of Jewish life in Palestine shifted to Galilee. An autonomous Jewish presence existed until 429 CE, and Jews constituted a majority of the population of Palestine until at least the sixth century CE.
